Some panelists, however, thought these third places were critical opportunities for communities to support their neighbors.

This pandemic is not something that our communities will ever fully recover from. It has been a reminder of the ways we are inextricably connected to one another and how we must continue to support each other. And with that comes a disintegration of connection and community ties … as well as individual wellbeing.

This pandemic has been catastrophic. It has exposed the inequities that we, as a society, have been grappling with for some time. It will continue to expose safety concerns and inequities that we, as a society, have been grappling with. But some felt that the pandemic exposed inequities that we, as a society, have been grappling with.

Some panelists, however, thought these third places were critical opportunities for communities to support their neighbors.

This pandemic is not something that our communities will ever fully recover from. It has been a reminder of the ways we are inextricably connected to one another and how we must continue to support each other. And with that comes a disintegration of connection and community ties … as well as individual wellbeing.

This pandemic has been catastrophic. It has exposed the inequities that we, as a society, have been grappling with for some time. It will continue to expose safety concerns and inequities that we, as a society, have been grappling with.

Some panelists, however, thought these third places were critical opportunities for communities to support their neighbors.

This pandemic is not something that our communities will ever fully recover from. It has been a reminder of the ways we are inextricably connected to one another and how we must continue to support each other. And with that comes a disintegration of connection and community ties … as well as individual wellbeing.

This pandemic has been catastrophic. It has exposed the inequities that we, as a society, have been grappling with for some time. It will continue to expose safety concerns and inequities that we, as a society, have been grappling with.