Relevancy in a Tumultuous 2020

2020 HAS BEEN A YEAR of historic transitions, cultural and civil unrest, and an ongoing pandemic. All of us are grappling with the changes that these things are causing in our communities.

For science museums and other similar institutions that are more removed from the public eye, the need to make sure that science museums and their content are being used by the public is more critical than ever before. But they reserved these comments for the people of color and marginalized folks.

We asked our Pandemic Panelists what they thought museums should be doing to help their communities amidst these three challenges, as well.

For science museums and other similar institutions that are more removed from the public eye, the need to make sure that science museums and their content are being used by the public is more critical than ever before. But they reserved these comments for the people of color and marginalized folks.

We asked our Pandemic Panelists what they thought museums should be doing to help their communities amidst these three challenges, as well.

Why?

Because museums need to be part of the discussions about civil unrest, they are starting to address the root causes of some of these issues and have done so in the name of history in a way that is meaningful.

Acknowledging the harms caused, making amends, and striving for a more just and equal world have never been more important. These efforts should be a continued part of all history museums.

Relevancy in a Tumultuous 2020

2020 HAS BEEN A YEAR of historic transitions, cultural and civil unrest, and an ongoing pandemic. All of us are grappling with the changes that these things are causing in our communities.

For science museums and other similar institutions that are more removed from the public eye, the need to make sure that science museums and their content are being used by the public is more critical than ever before. But they reserved these comments for the people of color and marginalized folks.

We asked our Pandemic Panelists what they thought museums should be doing to help their communities amidst these three challenges, as well.

Why?

Because museums need to be part of the discussions about civil unrest, they are starting to address the root causes of some of these issues and have done so in the name of history in a way that is meaningful.

Acknowledging the harms caused, making amends, and striving for a more just and equal world have never been more important. These efforts should be a continued part of all history museums.

Relevancy in a Tumultuous 2020

2020 HAS BEEN A YEAR of historic transitions, cultural and civil unrest, and an ongoing pandemic. All of us are grappling with the changes that these things are causing in our communities.

For science museums and other similar institutions that are more removed from the public eye, the need to make sure that science museums and their content are being used by the public is more critical than ever before. But they reserved these comments for the people of color and marginalized folks.

We asked our Pandemic Panelists what they thought museums should be doing to help their communities amidst these three challenges, as well.

Why?

Because museums need to be part of the discussions about civil unrest, they are starting to address the root causes of some of these issues and have done so in the name of history in a way that is meaningful.

Acknowledging the harms caused, making amends, and striving for a more just and equal world have never been more important. These efforts should be a continued part of all history museums.

Relevancy in a Tumultuous 2020

2020 HAS BEEN A YEAR of historic transitions, cultural and civil unrest, and an ongoing pandemic. All of us are grappling with the changes that these things are causing in our communities.

For science museums and other similar institutions that are more removed from the public eye, the need to make sure that science museums and their content are being used by the public is more critical than ever before. But they reserved these comments for the people of color and marginalized folks.

We asked our Pandemic Panelists what they thought museums should be doing to help their communities amidst these three challenges, as well.

Why?

Because museums need to be part of the discussions about civil unrest, they are starting to address the root causes of some of these issues and have done so in the name of history in a way that is meaningful.

Acknowledging the harms caused, making amends, and striving for a more just and equal world have never been more important. These efforts should be a continued part of all history museums.